I experienced Darkest Dungeon for the first time watching people on Twitch play games on my PC. I love the visual presentation of the game - that dark noir style artwork, animations, nar0ses, music ... It's just a great dungeon crawler - a crawler you don't need a premium PC to play. Before buying the game myself, I read reviews online – the biggest gripe for most is random number generators, and because of the coincidence, you never know what will work and what won't. For someone trying to beat the game, I can see how that can be a disappointment. For me, though, I guess I'm more of a normal player, and if my team of explorers doesn't make it through a mission, it's no big deal. I'll just recruit a new team and try again, or even try again from Slate new by starting a new game. I just think this is a beautiful and intensive game that's a great time killer! It is possible that having this game on tablets is a huge bonus! Some people say that the menus are too small, but for my iPad 2 Air screen, it looks good. The fact that you can share savings between PCs and tablets are also a great feature! If you play this game to win, you will probably get frustrated with it in the end. If you play to just enjoy the game - win or lose - you will probably enjoy this game. When I first saw this game, I thought it would be a fun thing to try. Granted, it took some getting used to the entire strategy system, but now it is so role-playing I can't put it down once I start a session (which usually lasts for hours before I'm ready to stop). This game has a way to put stress not only on the characters you control, but on you as well. The jarring hits and sound effects, the dark design of the enemy, and the idea that random encounters or detrimental events can occur at any time make me nervous and stressed, but more willing than ever to tear my enemies apart from pieces. My only wish is that while there are a lot of explorers already, I feel one or two more with different topics will round out my list more fully. All in all, this is a sound investment for those who prefer turn based on action. First of all, I'm a fan of Darkest Dungeon as a game. But this iOS version of it is especially awful. I have an iPad Air 2, so it is not terribly old with some odd aspect ratio or small screen. Even so, the game letterboxes almost everything by an inch on both the top and bottom, severely shrinking things down. On top of that, the user interface and in-game text are very small even compared to the available screen real estate. Then, above all, all the description pop-ups that appear when pressing the tool appear DIRECTLY UNDER YOUR FINGER! How does a reasonable human being even do it? The little text can't even be read because your own finger is obscuring most of it. Interacting with the interface is also very rough, because there is no distinction between choosing something and actually activating it. You have to press and hold the tool to get the pop-up description that shows you what it actually does, and if you just click on something it immediately activates it. The game was originally built to play with a mouse, so a lot of important information about what the hell interface elements or items actually do is completely hidden from you, often requiring you to hover over it to see a pop up. So you have to hit and hold everything just to see what it does, and if you accidentally exploit it instead, it immediately activates it. And those important pop ups will be small and hidden with your fingers anyway!
